

Season's Greetings

Bearing Witness

Several years ago my sisters and I shared caretaking for our Mother who was dying of Ovarian Cancer. As it turned out, the last week of Mom's physical life I was "on duty". At night when Mom got up from bed she would require assistance as she was pretty weak. Upon returning to her bedroom she'd sit on the edge of the bed and I'd rub her back.

Her cat Sugar, a short haired blonde with red highlights on his face and beautiful blue eyes, slept on the bed with her. One night just a few days before her transition she sat on the bed and while I rubbed her back. Sugar got up and came closer to Mom. He looked up into her eyes and she looked down into his. The love that transferred between them and the acknowledgements of what each meant to the other over the years was tangible and breathtaking. There were no words between them and none were necessary. For that matter, there were no words that could describe the feeling of what I just witnessed. It was truly a sacred moment that will be with me forever.

Recently I said good bye to one of my beloved cat family members, Flame. Interestingly enough, he too was a blonde colored cat with red highlights on his face and beautiful blue eyes. The only major difference in Flame's physical appearance and Sugar was that Flame had longer fur.

Flame was only ten years old when he left his physical body so it seemed an untimely death and yet I had always known he wasn't going to live what I defined a long life. Due to nerve damage he lost the ability to relieve his bladder and colon. In the days before he left his physical body I would sit with him and not once but multiple times he would look into my eyes and I would experience what I witnessed between my Mom and her Sugar.

While several years have gone by since my Mom has passed and I witnessed that sacred exchange between her and Sugar, I am comforted by that memory and my recent exchange with my Flame. I see life's continual circle and am reminded of what a dog said through me to his person, "Love never dies...".

This holiday season, I look back on the many times I have been witness to the love between you and your animal companions. While I haven't gotten to sit with most of you physically to experience this as I did with my Mom and her friend I still have felt it. Thank you for using my services in 2009. You and your animals truly bless and enhance my life. As always it is an honor and privilege to be your bridge between you and your animal brothers and sisters.

Warmest holiday wishes and in kinship,

Patty
